

The Rachel Carson Campus Network promotes education, research, and civic engagement around environmental health, social justice and climate change. The RCCN builds alliances between 40 campuses nationwide and other stakeholders, including communities, organizers, and advocacy organizations. The RCCN's mechanisms for action include curricular development, coordinating research partnerships, conducting advocacy trainings, and creating calls-to-action for sustainable and equitable policy.

1. SIGN UP FOR THE RCCN

Sign up for RCC updates to receive our eNewsletter and learn about endeavors on campuses nationwide. Access fact sheets, presentations, and Guides to Research and Action on a range of issues.

2. EVENT ON RACHEL CARSON'S VALUES AND ENVIRONMENTAL ADVOCACY WITH DR. ROBERT K. MUSIL

Dr. Robert K. Musil, PhD, MPH is President and CEO of the Rachel Carson Council and a leader on global sustainability, environmental health, and preparing leaders in higher education to effectively advocate at state and national levels. In his presentations, Dr. Musil introduces students to the values that drove Rachel Carson's research, how she translated research into action, and how young people can drive policy change and social movements today.

3. JOIN A CAMPUS CLUSTER

Where are current campus clusters? RCCN currently coordinates clusters in the Southeast, Mid-Atlantic, and New England. Three active campuses constitute a cluster.

What is involved in becoming an active campus? Maintain regular contact with RCC staff members Zoë Ackerman and Elijah Brunson. Identify cross-campus needs around environmental justice, community-based research, advocacy skills training, and voter participation.

What are the benefits of joining a cluster? Connecting initiatives across campuses, sharing resources, setting up trainings, and orchestrating interdisciplinary research for environmental justice and social action. The RCC also routinely convenes panels and presentations at national conferences in Washington, DC and elsewhere, raising the profile of specific issues and bringing leaders together across different backgrounds.
